

Dr. John McLoughlin, chief factor at Fort Vancouver (1824-45) and the strongest arm of the Hudsons Bay Company in a colonial Pacific Northwest, was a man easily mythologized yet poorly known. The man now called The Father of Oregon was cast out first by his company and later deserted by the pioneers he had unstintingly aided. Born near Quebec in 1784, John McLoughlin found himself between two worlds throughout his life. After training as a doctor, McLoughlin struck out for the fur country as a company doctor and clerk. He came to the Pacific Northwest in 1824 with his family, where he established the Hudsons Bay Company headquarters at Fort Vancouver. Known for his compassion and blistering temper, he kept peace, made money for the company, and defended British interests in the region. He assisted starving, exhausted Oregon Trail settlers, maintaining relations with them while America and Great Britain decided the prickly question of national boundaries. In 1845, during a year of great personal tragedies, he was maneuvered out of his position by forces within the company. Dorothy Morrisons comprehensive biography takes a fresh view of this complex and passionate man whose personal story illuminates the history of the settlement of the Pacific Northwest. Over 100 illustrations and six maps enhance this epic story.
